The identification of persons or things that are in the vicinity of the surveillance system is often a desirable feature. This is particularly true in many mobile surveillance applications, such as those using vehicles. For example, a security guard or a police officer may wish to monitor the road the security guard drives, while the security guard is on a call. The ability to identify a person or thing in the vicinity of the surveillance system is only possible if the surveillance system is already aware of the person or thing in the vicinity. For example, if the surveillance system is a camera, the camera must know which direction the person is facing. One technique for identifying a person or thing in the vicinity of the surveillance system is to use a fixed, or external, sensor. A fixed sensor that detects the presence of a particular object or person can be used to derive the direction that the person is facing or the presence of a particular object. It is possible to update the knowledge regarding the direction of interest by adjusting the angle and/or position of the camera with respect to the fixed sensor. Another approach is to use an adaptive sensor. The adaptive sensor is placed in the vicinity of a surveillance system. As the system observes the area in which it

- Q: IIS Hosting Application issue running as IIS_IUSRS This was previously answered, but that solution did not work for me. I keep getting the below error when I try to access a web application hosted in IIS8.5. This is how the web application folder is set up: The application is on a dedicated machine that is part of a farm. The "hosts file" has the following: ::1 localhost localhost localhost.localdomain 10.0.0.10 10.0.0.14 The security of the IIS application pool is set to "integrated". The application works fine if it is run with my user account. It seems to have something to do with the IIS_IUS
